

10 Recruiting Strategies for a Tight Labor Market - Part 1

Recruiting is one of the most important functions of any company, especially in a tight labor market. Just as you market and sell to prospective customers, you must put that same focus and effort into selling potential employees on joining your company.

This document, which is the first in a two-part series, covers 5 tips and strategies to help improve your success in attracting and hiring qualified candidates for your company.

Make the careers section of your website shine

Your website is the face of your company and potential candidates will certainly visit, so make sure it not only represents your company well but also sells candidates on the benefits of working for your company.

A careers section of your website should showcase your culture and environment which are important considerations for any candidate. Clearly defining your culture pays dividends in the recruitment process by helping attract employees who share the values central to your company's mission. It serves a dual purpose because it also discourages individuals who don't find those values appealing from becoming candidates. A great way to communicate your culture and environment is to create a video that showcases various employees describing the culture, why they like working there, and perhaps even a tour of the office.

In addition to culture, be sure to inform candidates of your benefits and how you support work/life balance for employees. The ability to work remotely could be a significant benefit, especially after so many employees worked from home over the past year. And, don't underestimate non-traditional benefits such as free employee lunches, off-site outings, mentoring programs, employee wellness programs, and flexible work hours.

A careers section should have a list of current openings, but make it clear that you're always looking for rockstars regardless of whether or not you have an open position. For this reason, enable candidates to submit their resumes or contact a hiring manager even if a matching open job doesn't exist.

If your company hires interns or recent graduates, consider having a section dedicated to those candidates and another section dedicated to experienced professionals. Recent graduates may be very interested in training and mentoring, whereas experienced professionals may be driven by more strategic opportunities.

Finally, it's not just the careers section of your website that's important. Any serious candidate will run through the other sections of your website to learn about your position in the market, services, products, team, thought leadership, and expertise. If your website is outdated, lacks content, or is simply unimpressive, it will be a red flag for any candidate.

Use applicant tracking software

Applicant tracking software enables you to manage your job openings and candidates. This type of software integrates with your website so you can post jobs and receive applicant submissions through your website. It enables you to match the right candidates with the right jobs and track the hiring process so no candidate falls through the cracks. It also enables you to better communicate with each candidate so they are not left in the dark throughout the hiring process.

Finally, there is enormous value in building and nurturing a pool of candidates. Quite often, especially for professionals, the decision to make a job change is a long process. For this reason, it's important for a company to stay in touch and nurture candidates for the long term. All too often, hiring the right candidate is a matter of reaching out at the right time - at a time when they didn't get promoted, didn't get a bonus, or have finally had enough with poor management. An applicant tracking system enables a firm to stay organized and continuously communicate with all candidates for the long term.

You can find a fairly comprehensive list of applicant management systems along with reviews at sites like g2.com and capterra.com.

Write compelling job descriptions

If you haven't already, read each of your job descriptions and consider whether or not you'd be excited to apply for the job. Job descriptions are tough to write and more often than not focus on job responsibilities, requirements, and qualifications. While these are important, you've got to put your sales and marketing hat on. Be sure to include information on the growth of the company, mission, culture, benefits, perks, and opportunities for advancement. Get your marketing team to help in wordsmithing the job description so it not only portrays the facts of the job and company but speaks to the emotions of the candidate.

Monitor and manage your online reputation

Candidates will research your company, especially online. First, be sure to apply for any potential awards such as any Best Places to Work awards. Being a finalist or winner in these types of competitions can provide great branding opportunities.

Second, be sure to review postings on Glassdoor and other employee review sites. Yes, former employees are able to vent and post negative comments, but it's important to understand what current and former employees are saying. You can typically respond when appropriate and notify the site of any untrue or illegitimate postings. Be sure to encourage current employees to post their own reviews, which will not only show well for potential employees but may drown out and dilute any negative comments.

Finally, perform general google and social media searches on your company. Potential candidates will be doing the same. If for any reason negative articles show in search results, you may want to consider working with an SEO or reputation management company to elevate positive articles in search results.

Develop a Strong Referral Program

A referral program can be a powerful source of qualified candidates for your company.

Establish a list of referral sources including internal employees and external referral sources. Provide your referral sources with the information they need. Keep them informed of new job openings and make sure they know the process for referring potential candidates to you.

You may want to offer a reward for a successful hire. Research conducted by the Human Capital Institute indicated that most companies offer a cash reward and the median amount was $1,000.

The timing of a reward is important. Consider paying the reward after the new employee has been employed for a certain amount of time. Or, pay a portion upon hire and then the balance at a later date. This helps ensure that high-quality candidates are being referred.

Finally, marketing is a huge part of a successful referral program. Consistently remind referral sources of the program and job openings. Upon receiving a referral, be sure to keep both the candidate and the referral source well informed. Don't forget that your referral source may be a key asset in the hiring process because they may be communicating with the candidate every step of the way. Finally, communicate the results of the program to your referral sources because the success of the program can be very motivating.

About Larson Gross

Ted Larson and Dennis Gross founded our firm in 1949. They built the business based on excellence, passion, integrity, trust and pro-action — values still important to us more than seven decades later.

Even well into their retirement years, Ted Larson and Dennis Gross continued to have the best interest of the firm at heart. Mr. Larson would come into the office on a regular basis to meet every new face and make a personal connection with each of our team members. He remembered the name of every employee, as well as the names of their spouses and children, and would greet clients by name as he passed by the reception desk. Sometimes, you'd even find a newspaper clipping on your desk that Mr. Larson dropped off, highlighting that your son made the honor roll. This is the example of a genuine relationship we strive to embody with our people and clients.

Today, we're led by ten partners who are growing our firm with respect for where we've come from and a new vision for future success. Our 120-plus team members and three offices located in Bellingham, Lynden and Burlington make us the 10th largest public accounting firm in the Puget Sound region. While we're determined to expand our impact and help strengthen as many businesses and individuals as we can, we're also committed to remaining a locally-owned organization. We're incredibly proud of where we've come from and look forward to a future of possibility
