

Weathering Policy Changes: A Nonprofit's Guide to Staying Agile

Political changes can quickly reshape funding streams, regulatory requirements, and community needs. For nonprofits, these shifts can mean scrambling to adapt budgets, operations, and strategies with little notice. Yet, rather than treating every shift as a crisis, you can prepare in advance - so when policies, priorities, or government support change, you'll have the tools to respond effectively and keep your mission on track.

Understanding the impact of political changes

It's no secret that new administrations and changing priorities can alter the nonprofit landscape. Tax regulations may affect donor incentives, government funding might tighten, or reporting requirements could grow more complex. These adjustments can put added pressure on programs and stretch resources thin. Still, the point isn't to dwell on these issues but to recognize that they happen and prepare accordingly.

Strategies for navigating political change

While you can't control political forces, you can control how you respond. By building flexibility into your structure, seeking diverse funding streams, and engaging in proactive planning, you'll be better positioned to meet new challenges as they arise.

Stay informed

Knowledge is your first defense. Keep tabs on policy proposals and legislative shifts at the local, state, and federal levels. This doesn't mean becoming partisan - it means understanding the regulatory environment that shapes your funding and operations. If a proposed law might reduce grant availability in your field, you can start seeking alternative support now instead of reacting at the last minute.

Also, engage in advocacy efforts where appropriate. Participate in coalitions, communicate with policymakers, and educate your board, staff, and supporters about the impact of looming changes. Speaking up can influence policies that affect your work and help you stay ahead of shifts rather than scrambling to catch up.

Diversify your funding sources

Relying heavily on a single funding stream—especially government grants - leaves your organization vulnerable to political whims. To build resilience, consider a mix of support: private foundation grants, corporate partnerships, individual donors, and even earned income opportunities. For example, a workforce development nonprofit might offer paid training workshops to local businesses, creating a revenue source independent of government funding cycles.

Even modest steps toward diversification help stabilize your finances. The broader your funding base, the less likely you are to face sudden financial crises when political winds blow in a new direction.

Adapt to changing regulations

Shifts in policy often come with new rules for your internal operations. Whether it's updated reporting requirements or stricter oversight of certain program areas, staying compliant is non-negotiable. This might mean consulting with legal experts for guidance or revising internal policies and procedures to meet new standards. Proactive training for staff and board members can also ease the transition.

Strengthen internal capacity and resilience

Resilient organizations respond to change without losing momentum. Focus on building internal strength - develop a strong financial reserve, so short-term funding cuts don't cripple your operations. Invest in technology to manage data efficiently, track outcomes, and report results with confidence. Encourage leadership development at all levels so that when outside factors shift, you have a capable team ready to pivot.

Think broadly: improving internal communication, clarifying decision-making processes, and creating contingency plans can keep your nonprofit on steady ground. A culture that embraces flexibility, continuous learning, and innovation can handle political shifts more comfortably. For instance, scenario planning - exploring “what if” situations - helps you identify risks and outline responses before they’re urgently needed.

Leverage partnerships and collaboration

Working together amplifies impact. By forming alliances with other nonprofits and businesses, you can share resources, combine expertise, and tackle challenges collectively. Relationships built on mutual goals can lead to new funding streams, in-kind support, and stronger advocacy efforts.

When changes occur, a supportive network can mean the difference between scrambling alone or adapting as part of a community. The nonprofit that partners with a local healthcare provider, for example, might tap into that partner’s expertise and credibility when policies affecting public health funding arise.

Communicate your value clearly

In times of change, it’s more important than ever to show donors, policymakers, and your community how your work makes a difference. Transparent reporting of outcomes, compelling storytelling, and consistent updates keep stakeholders engaged and invested in your success. The more people understand what you do and why it matters, the more support you’ll have when external conditions shift.

Next Step

This article offers general guidance to help your nonprofit remain agile and focused, even when external conditions shift. By understanding potential challenges, diversifying your resources, and embracing proactive strategies, you can continue making a meaningful impact in your community.

Still have questions about how changing policies might affect your organization's financial health, compliance requirements, or long-term planning? Consider reaching out to our office for personalized guidance. With the right financial insights and support, you can weather any transition and keep your mission on track.

About Larson Gross

Ted Larson and Dennis Gross founded our firm in 1949. They built the business based on excellence, passion, integrity, trust and pro-action — values still important to us more than seven decades later.

Even well into their retirement years, Ted Larson and Dennis Gross continued to have the best interest of the firm at heart. Mr. Larson would come into the office on a regular basis to meet every new face and make a personal connection with each of our team members. He remembered the name of every employee, as well as the names of their spouses and children, and would greet clients by name as he passed by the reception desk. Sometimes, you'd even find a newspaper clipping on your desk that Mr. Larson dropped off, highlighting that your son made the honor roll. This is the example of a genuine relationship we strive to embody with our people and clients.

Today, we're led by ten partners who are growing our firm with respect for where we've come from and a new vision for future success. Our 120-plus team members and three offices located in Bellingham, Lynden and Burlington make us the 10th largest public accounting firm in the Puget Sound region. While we're determined to expand our impact and help strengthen as many businesses and individuals as we can, we're also committed to remaining a locally-owned organization. We're incredibly proud of where we've come from and look forward to a future of possibility

Larson Gross
2211 Rimland Dr.
Suite 422
Bellingham, WA 98226

(800) 447-0177

contact@larsongross.com

<https://larsongross.com>

